Local businesses highlighted in regional competition

By DAN RUDY
Sentinel writer

On Monday organizers of the regional business development competition Path to Prosperity announced their 12 finalists for 2018, three of which come from Petersburg and Wrangell.

Focused on encouraging entrepreneurship in Southeast Alaska communities, P2P is a programming partnership between Spruce Root Inc. and The Nature Conservancy. The latter is an environmental organization centered in Arlington, Virginia, while the former is a rebranding of Haa Aani Economic Development and its associated community development fund, projects supported by Sealaska Corporation in Juneau.

In addition to small loans and capital support, Spruce Root's P2P competition entices regional business owners to develop new ventures to increase profitability and employment, while also making use of local resources in a sustainable fashion. For the past six years, the competition selects from its pool of applicants a dozen stand-out proposals, with finalists brought to Juneau for a several-day business boot camp and entrepreneurial guidance.

After honing out finished business plans, one applicant is selected for a capital grant, this year in the amount of $25,000. Those resources can go toward the awardee's business to help with consultancy fees, marketing or other development.

Wrangell residents have been among awardees in recent P2P competitions, such as for local agricultural start-up Mighty Bear Roots last year and Raven Guitars in 2014. Another resident is among this year's finalists, Angie Angie Flickinger works on a new product at Groundswell, a shop she co-runs. The storefront is home both to her natural care products business, Gathered & Grown Botanicals, and The Fisherman & The Florist, which specializes in flowers.

Flickinger of Gathered & Grown Botanicals.

"I create hand-crafted herbal bath and body care products built around locally-harvested plants," she explained of her business. "Each product is meant to establish a deeper connection with the natural world, so that you get some of the inherent benefits of some of the plants that grow around here, and also sort of the sensory experience."

For instance, one of her products is a variety of bath salts mixed with area kelp and peppermint. Flickinger said the scents are "meant to transport you to the ocean, and feel like you're a little more connected to that environment, but also are good for the skin and for the body. Everything is kind of built around this sense of place and connection to our rainforest environment."

The business also features handmade soaps and infused oils. It had started for Flickinger as an interest in herbs, soon developing into a hobby. Turning the hobby into a business was a step that took on a third dimension last year when she opened up a Front Street shop called Groundswell with friend Mya DeLong, whose floral business makes up the other half of the storefront.

Among this year's P2P finalists from Petersburg is John Murgas of Petersburg Marine. He likened his business to Wrangell's Marine Service Center, an open yard smaller in scale and privately rather than municipally owned. Like their public-sector counterparts at Wrangell's Harbor Department, Petersburg Marine hauls out and prepares boats for service, projects which can be then conducted by an assortment of insured and licensed contractors.

"We have two hydraulic trailers that handle the majority of our commercial fleet here," Murgas explained. Adapting an existing waterside turnaround for aircraft to haulout use, his company acquired its first lift 10 years ago, doubling its capacity a few years ago. "Those can haul vessels up to 45 tons. So that includes all the gillnet fleet, the majority of the troll fleet," but not the larger seine fleet, he added.

"We offer pressure washing that is treated. It reduces the effluent that goes into the water from pressure washing on the grids," Murgas continued. This effluent is often more than marine growth, including paint from a vessel's previous coat.

"It's primarily cuprous oxide, which by itself is not toxic, but if you get high concentrations of it in any one area it can cause problems. In the harbor, for instance," said Murgas. His company has from the start captured this material for safe disposal, but he sees room for improvement.

"We would like to expand on that, modernize it a little bit. Some professional help on how to finance that should pay off pretty well," he thought. Murgas added that the planned bootcamp should yield some useful tips and processes on how to better manage and advertise for his business.

Fellow finalist Marja Smets also calls Petersburg home, operating Farragut Farm with husband Bo Varsano at Farragut Bay.

"This is our ninth year of business," she said. "My husband, Bo, and I have been talking about possibly expanding."

For the P2P competition Smets is proposing a venture called Blue Drum Farm, which would make use of high tunnels, a sort of cost-effective greenhouse that allows for longer growing seasons and greater crop variety.

"It's basically an urban microfarm, high-intensity production so we get a lot of food off of a small area," said Smets. "You can grow just about anything in high tunnels. It's still tricky with hot weather crops like eggplants or peppers, things that require a lot of heat. But on Farragut Farm in our high tunnels we're growing over 40 different varieties of vegetables, so there's a lot of potential to grow a wide vari-

Driver reportedly intoxicated in fatal accident

By DAN RUDY
Sentinel writer

Laboratory results from a fatal car accident last month indicate the driver had been under the influence of alcohol prior to the crash.

Rainie Doak had been driving home with her three children on Zimovia Highway late the evening of June 10 when she lost control of the vehicle prior to crossing the Pats Creek Bridge, about 12 miles south of Wrangell. The sports utility vehicle avoided hitting the guard rail but ran into the creek, upturning in the process and discharging the occupants.

Doak and one of the children had been killed at the scene, while the survivors were not discovered until the following evening by a pedestrian. The two were quickly evacuated by air for emergency treatment, and are both now on the mend.

Indications at the scene suggested Doak had been driving well above the posted speed limit on her approach, and that none of the occupants had been fastened in by seat belts. Subsequent toxicology tests at the state laboratory in Anchorage found she had also been intoxicated at the time, at above twice the statutory 0.08 percent blood alcohol content. Results were returned to Wrangell Police Department last week.

ety of just about anything you might like.

"We feel like the model that we're looking to create could really be replicable to any of the other communities in Southeast," in effect creating a template for aspiring farmers in other communities in the region. "For years now we have been working to help the movement of increasing local food in Southeast, getting more people to think about growing in our region. We've also thought of doing some expansion of our own business, and came up with this idea for Blue Drum Farm, that might meet both those goals."

All three finalists anticipated a positive experience at the upcoming business bootcamp, and each had similar goals with it.

"We're looking forward to getting help with the numbers, and kind of coming up with a more formal business plan that can help us narrow it down," said Smets. "We've thought about doing it CSA style, or we've thought about selling more to restaurants, and we want to just work the numbers to see which option makes the most sense to have a thriving business." A CSA, or community-supported agriculture, has customers buy shares in a farm's yield ahead of the season, receiving produce as it is harvested.

"We want to do a better job at what we're doing, in particular on the environmental end of it," said Murgas. "The association with The Nature Conservancy is exciting."

"I'm excited for the bootcamp," said Flickinger. "I think it will be really good information, and just good to connect with other people who are doing something similar. I think running a business in Southeast Alaska has its own unique challenges, so it will be cool to just hear what other people are doing, what they're learning, and just to have a nice network of peers."

P2P officials are already looking for applications for the 2019 competition. Entrepreneurs interested in learning more or applying can look over their website at www.spruceroor.org.

Trooper report

June 25

Alaska Wildlife Troopers contacted Elmer Mork, 60, of Wrangell, at Heritage Harbor after an investigation determined he had failed to log his personal use shrimp prior to concealing from view or leaving the fishing grounds. Mork was issued a $210 citation. Fishermen who harvest shrimp for sport, personal use, or subsistence are reminded to log their catch in ink on their permit prior to concealing the shrimp from view or leaving the fishing grounds.

July 2

Alaska Wildlife Troopers concluded an investigation involving Bruce Kautz, 63, of Wrangell, after determining he had made a false statement on a 2013 fishing license. Kautz was issued a $310 citation at the District Court at Wrangell.

Ferry troubles strike summer schedule

By DAN RUDY
Sentinel writer

Technical trouble with the state ferry system has put a crimp on interisland travel recently.

The M/V Columbia – one of two vessels making the north-south run each week in Southeast Alaska – had a longer than expected stop into Bellingham, Washington after arriving June 29. Crew members discovered black smoke in the ship's bow thruster room, prompting use of a fixed carbon dioxide fire fighting system and evacuation of the vessel.

No fire had been evident, and all passengers aboard were reportedly fine.

As for the Columbia, Alaska Marine Highway System identified the 45-year-old vessel's exhaust system as the source of the smoke, with a rebuild necessary. The ship has subsequently been taken out of two weeks' rotation while work goes on in Bellingham. It is expected to resume service this week, arriving in Wrangell on its northward leg on Sunday.

Expectant passengers were contacted about the disruption to service, receiving either refunded fares or the opportunity to reschedule sailings. Public information officer Aurah Landau estimated the first of those two lost weeks had been just about fully booked at the time, with the present week two-thirds of the way reserved. The Columbia has a passenger capacity of 499, according to its AMHS vessel profile.

The second of the two primary ferries operating in Southeast this summer, the M/V Malaspina has continued its weekly service, though minor repairs have also compelled AMHS to adjust its schedule. It has also seen some major issues this year, with its scheduled overhaul taking an additional month before its return to service in late April.

The ferry system's woes come at an inopportune time, falling over the extended July 4 weekend. Summertime is when the service sees its highest share of ridership, with traffic in Southeast making up around three quarters of the system's total volume.

This year's July 4 Royalty Competition get ready to draw winning tickets in the drawing. At left, Robbie Marshall set records with sales of 62,792 tickets and by competition's first crowned king. Crowned prince and princess beside him, Sydney Young and KayDee Howell sold 25,960 and 13,630 tickets, respectively

Second-place in the bicycle category of this year's parade awards, Sydney Young participates in the July 4 parade down front street, as Community Roots marchers spread petals just behind.

The greased pole competition try to make things difficult for Saiyan Baker. In this attempt, Baker ended up reaching the cord at the end and winning the competition. It is not so easy to do so.

The yolk is on one contestant during this year's egg toss competition. Held on a cordoned-off section of Front Street just outside of the Sentinel office, dozens of pairs of participants gradually increase their distance as they try to carefully lob the delicate ellipsoids back and forth.
